Delivery Performance

To give customers a better idea of how contract holders perform at meeting the agreed upon delivery date for orders they have been awarded, the SEWP Program has launched a Delivery Program Performance rating column on the Program Performance page on the SEWP website.

The goal here is to ensure that contract holders are providing accurate lead times when quoting against their SEWP contracts. SEWP has always given the contract holders the ability to keep customers informed of order delivery issues, and now customers will be able to check a contract holder's delivery performance to make a better informed procurement decision especially for their time sensitive requirements.

The delivery performance rating is different from the other four program performance categories, in that it is updated monthly, and based on the contract holder's delivery performance over the previous three months. The contract holder is rated on how many orders that fail to meet the agreed upon delivery date, orders that ship after the agreed upon delivery date, and the average time they delay an order. SEWP is only tracking delivery performance for orders where tangible products are shipped and not orders that are primarily period of performance (POP). Mainly because POP orders tend to require more coordination of effort by both the customer and contract holder. For more information on the ratings and how it is calculated visit the Program Performance page on the SEWP website.
